

Take the first step towards sustainability.

Your path to net zero.

At the heart of sustainability lies the need to understand and manage our carbon footprint. Carbon accounting is a vital tool in this endeavour. It involves measuring, recording, and analysing the amount of greenhouse gases (GHGs), particularly carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>), emitted directly or indirectly by an organisation, activity, or product.

Why carbon accounting matters

Environmental responsibility

By quantifying emissions, businesses can take responsibility for their environmental impact and work towards reducing it.

Regulatory compliance

The Australian Treasury has released a proposal setting out the climate-related information many companies may soon need to disclose. Under the proposal, companies will need to disclose climate-related information as part of their general financial reporting, starting as early as July 2024 for some companies.

Risk management

Transparent and comparable climate-related data is crucial for both companies and their stakeholders to identify, assess and manage climate-related risks as well as identify opportunities.

Cost savings

Identifying emission sources can lead to efficiency improvements, reducing operational costs in the long run.

Brand reputation

Demonstrating a commitment to sustainability enhances brand reputation and attractiveness to stakeholders.
